WalkTeaming

A fresh activity.
A reason to walk.

A free community talk with Jeremy Criddle, the founder and developer of WalkTeaming in Colorado Springs.

The session

A 15-30 minute talk about walking and its benefits, followed by a demonstration of how WalkTeaming makes everyday steps more fun. Interested residents can then get hands-on help downloading the app and connecting their steps.

When and where

An available group and meeting room may be enough to get started during Jeremy's visit. After a short break, later today, tomorrow, or another opening can also work. Larger communities can discuss recurring monthly sessions.

For phone setup

Ask residents to bring a charged iPhone or Android phone and be ready to use their app store account. Reliable internet helps. The walkthrough is at InstallQuestions.com.

The talk is free. App signup is optional.

Eligible new subscribers get two months free, then $7.99/month in the U.S., renewing automatically until canceled through Apple or Google Play. The store shows the price and trial terms before confirmation.

WalkTeaming

What residents will see

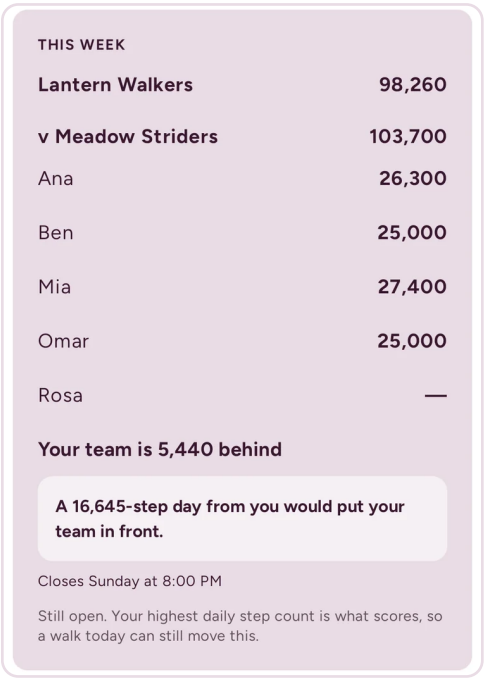

Four pages, reached from a bar at the bottom of the screen. Big numbers and plain words. Pictures use made-up names and numbers.

Today. Today's steps in a big number, with a plain note on what they mean for the team.

Team. Their five-person team and each person's score for the week.

Match. This week's opponent, how far apart the teams are, and what one good walk would do.

Friends can be teammates

Residents who link up in the app are drawn onto a team with up to two linked friends when the month's teams are made. Teammates never have to walk together or at the same time.

It reads steps. That is all.

The app reads the number of steps taken each day. No location, no heart rate, no advertising, no analytics and no tracking. Any resident can delete their record from inside the app.
